Q: How to prevent a user from reusing a nickname? I am working on a site that has users who submit articles - no comments, nothing. This is a really bad idea for a few reasons. It would be incredibly easy to copy and paste complete articles and spam them to multiple sites - especially since the site is more popular on Facebook. Politics and religion are hot topics these days. People can take something said in a news article or on a Facebook post and come up with an argument or retort for that post/article and blur the lines between our two sites. It may be that no one significantly contributes to any articles, but if someone is it would help to prevent these kinds of problems. What is the best way to prevent someone from reusing a name?

A: There's two issues here: You should never expose anything used by the site as anything but ephemeral content. If people are willing to copy and paste articles, they'll copy and paste the name of the user with it. If people are willing to reprint random internet quotations, they'll reprint the user name. You want users to be able to do what they want with the content they submit. Is it appropriate to copy and paste a user's name and do so from all of their posts, or do you have an issue with somebody using the same name in multiple articles? If you do, then you want to actively prevent that. You might want to consider keeping the articles encapsulated (and possibly reworking your copy to tag "User Name (controversy)" on the side of every page), so that nobody can copy and paste the text without also copying the user name, but you'll need to be sure that it's a "good" user name and that it only happens once per article/user.

A: Use an IP based or reference ID or some other unique identifier to identify each user.

A: I'd suggest using the following hash: `$hash = md5( $user->password.`
